

LES

Sophie Dieuaide et Catel

PAPPOOSES

La colère de l'oiseau tonnerre

miniBD
casterman

the 1990s, the government's health policy was based on the idea of universal health coverage (UHC) and was implemented through the National Health Insurance (NHI) program (Ministry of Health 1999).

The NHI program was a social health insurance program that covered all citizens and was financed through a combination of government and private contributions. The program was designed to provide a basic level of health care to all citizens, regardless of their income or social status. The NHI program was a significant step toward UHC in South Korea, but it was not without its challenges.

One of the main challenges of the NHI program was its financing. The program was financed through a combination of government and private contributions, but the government's contribution was relatively small. This led to a situation where the program was not fully funded, and many citizens were unable to afford the full range of health services that the program was designed to provide.

Another challenge of the NHI program was its implementation. The program was implemented through a series of pilot programs, and it took several years before it was fully implemented. This led to a situation where the program was not fully implemented in many areas, and many citizens were unable to access the services that the program was designed to provide.

Despite these challenges, the NHI program was a significant step toward UHC in South Korea. It provided a basic level of health care to all citizens, and it was a significant step toward the goal of UHC. The NHI program was a key element of South Korea's health policy in the 1990s, and it played a major role in the country's health care system.

In the 2000s, the government's health policy was based on the idea of UHC and was implemented through the NHI program. The NHI program was a social health insurance program that covered all citizens and was financed through a combination of government and private contributions. The program was designed to provide a basic level of health care to all citizens, regardless of their income or social status.

The NHI program was a significant step toward UHC in South Korea, but it was not without its challenges. One of the main challenges of the NHI program was its financing. The program was financed through a combination of government and private contributions, but the government's contribution was relatively small. This led to a situation where the program was not fully funded, and many citizens were unable to afford the full range of health services that the program was designed to provide.

Another challenge of the NHI program was its implementation. The program was implemented through a series of pilot programs, and it took several years before it was fully implemented. This led to a situation where the program was not fully implemented in many areas, and many citizens were unable to access the services that the program was designed to provide.

*Pour mes papooses à moi : Thomas, Chloé et Baptiste.
Sophie Dieuaide*

*Pour Lara.
Catel*

Et un très très grand merci à Brigitte Ventrillon.

LES PAPPOOSES

La colère de l'oiseau tonnerre

Une histoire de Sophie Dieuaide
illustrée par Catel

Mise en couleur : Rémi Chaurand
Lettrage : Jean-Luc Ruault

